I peer closely at the photograph. I was more beautiful than Copenhagen. My perfect mouth gobbled an ice cream as I stood by the seaside. Two years later Abu Ghayeb took me with him to see his friend, a professor of plastic surgery in Turkey. He examined me, and then told him, "Bring her back in a few years time. She has a facial palsy, probably due to a small stroke. This isn't the right time to operate. She's still growing and her features will continue to change. If we operate now, she'll still have facial asymmetry as the muscles on the healthy side of her face will continue to grow. In Istanbul I learned to avoid ice cream and cameras, I walk out onto the balcony, I look down at the people below me. In the distance are queues of men and women, all carrying their ration cards waiting for rice, sugar, and tea at the food distribution points. The intensity of the heat raises a gray mirage that trembles between us. They eventually appear to me as masses that gradually melt away in vertical shapes. Their outlines coalesce into forms that look like crowds of Bedouins attempting to cross a road, but their bodies are dissolving into each other. They stay rooted to the spot and can't get across. A pigeon, the color of cement, is sheltering in the shade of the balcony's parapet, oblivious to my presence

Still working on it myself This week's post is on time management. Rephrased, it's on how you can find a job, get your work done, do some self-improvement projects or hobbies, and still have a social life, I'm a bit of an expert on this. I have ADHD. When I was younger. I couldn't keep my mind on anything for an extended period of time. Now that I'm "grown up" I am much better at this, but the habits I developed to get me through my childhood have stuck, I keep a day planner, lists, and I prioritize like a madwoman. You might have got some of that from my last post Gadgets for the Pros, but now I'll walk you through the process. I get a lot of stuff done in a day, as long as I follow these steps. Granted, some days my schedule goes to the birds. I call those "Wasted Days" and love them dearly. Every mind needs some down time. Still, on other days I follow this process and manage to work on my blog, my novel, my personal reading (all three books) job and grad school applications, and some other tasks aside (like cleaning those dishes). # The steps in this process are: List out all events in a calendar, like taking an exam. Highlight them or otherwise make them stand out. I advise
