Point me to one. # But you're ignoring the main point: Explosives don't melt steel either. Thermite melts in an precise spot, as the burn is so fast that very little heat has time to spread into the adjacent structure. So what else made whole steel beams glowing red?? # Interesting that the buildings immediately adjacent to WTC 7 weren't catastrophically damaged by fire or debris. Given WTC 7 was across the street from the WTC complex and 300 feet from the nearest WTC Tower, as well as partially blocked by the destroyed WTC 5 and WTC 6, and was tucked between other undestroyed buildings, it is even more problematic that it perfectly collapsed in on itself from a couple of fires and some minor debris damage. # 7 was in direct line of fire from multiple-ton pieces of falling debris. Major, not minor, damage to the south side you will also need to be watching out for the possibility of fraudulent flooded vehicles. # With hurricanes and tropical storms, as well as really bad thunderstorms in low-laying areas, floods are something that take place every year. In just the last couple weeks, Hurricane Sandy bombarded New York, New Jersey and several other areas of the East Coast. There have also been storms before and after that have contributed to flooding areas along the East Coast. # When these floods take place, unscrupulous dealerships and private parties will swoop in and buy cars that were damaged by water during the flooding. While this isn't illegal, what often takes place next is. # These dealerships and private parties will try to take the cars to other states and quickly flip them before the damage (usually electrical) becomes evident when the car gets completely dried out and things stop working. # Always ask for the vehicle history report (Carfax) for any used car you are purchasing! A vehicle history report will tell you if a car has been involved in accidents, but a spitting image of her siblings. She played basketball like her sister and baseball like her brothers, inheriting their collective thirst for competition. At 8, Broadstreet joined clubs in both sports, eventually starting on a successful travel softball team featuring girls now playing the sport collegiately. Years later, as an eighth-grader, she posed for a portrait in front of the retired basketball jerseys hanging inside Brea Olinda's gymnasium. The photo wound up inside that year's basketball media guide under the headline: " Tradition doesn't graduate. " After seeing how terribly basketball wrecked their oldest child's knees, Ned Broadstreet, a former football player at Ball State University, and his wife, Sally, encouraged their daughter to pursue a different sport in junior high. For Broadstreet - tall, athletic and intuitive - volleyball became the alternative. She joined Yorba Linda's Impact Volleyball Club in seventh grade. Her athleticism simplified the learning curve. Before her freshman year at Brea Olinda, the Broadstreets sought greater club competition for their daughter. " My first two years at Impact,
