Synopsis of Legally Blonde novel by Amanda Brown

His blonde is anything but dumb....,

Elle Woods, University of Southern California socio-political jewellery design major, is blonde, spoiled and desperately in love with Warner Huntingdon III. But when Warner announces he's dumping her to go off to Stanford, and that while there he aims to find a girl 'more serious' than Elle to be his wife, Elle and Underdog, her pet Bichon Frise, hatch a plan to follow him so that he will marry her like he's supposed to do. Elle decides that a little thing like law school won't come between them. Anything Warner can do, she can do better. Thanks to a creative application video and a demand for "diversity" at Stanford Law, Elle gets admitted. Soon she's packing her convertible as well as her pet Chihuahua "Underdog" and heading north, determined to win back her man. Due to a creative video and the need for all forms of diversity, Stanford accepts her.

Her determination guarantees her success at Stanford, but not in the way she expected. Smart, fast, and funny, Legally Blonde proves how much fun blondes really can have.

Elle's Stanford misadventures begin badly, and it seems the one place blondes definitely don't have more fun is law school. But then Elle's asked to defend one-time fitness queen Brooke Vandermark on a murder charge. Seizing the opportunity to prove her worth to Warner and her fellow classmates, she vindicates all who are blonde at heart with a tip any Cosmo girl should know.

Amanda Brown is an American author. She was born on October 6, 1970, in Paradise Valley, Arizona, United States. She is the daughter of Jack E. Brown, a lawyer, and Suzanne J. Brown, an art gallery owner. In 1993 Amanda Brown graduated from Arizona State University. From 1993 to 1995 she attended Stanford Law School. Brown, who left the Law School in 1995 after two years, says she's glad she went. "It helped me decide what I wanted to do: write."

Amanda Brown wrote the novel Legally Blonde, the prototype for the 2003 blockbuster movie of the same title, inspired by the law students she observed while studying at Stanford Law School. Her main character, the blonde Elle Woods, a California University senior and sorority president, expects to graduate with a major in sociopolitical jewelry design and marry Warner Huntington III. Warner breaks up with her in order to attend Stanford Law School and find a more studious girlfriend. Instead of allowing in disappointment, Elle plans to win him back and applies to Stanford Law School.

Amanda Brown is active in charities. She is also an activist. Brown serves on the board of the Peninsula Humane Society. She helps the group's professionals rehabilitate sick animals and find all homeless animals a place to live. She also works on a number of development projects, helping to raise money and awareness for the cause. Brown says that she is often asked why she works so hard to prevent animal cruelty when there is so much cruelty towards humans. Her argument: "all forms of cruelty are related and that humans would never be kind to each other unless they are kind to animals. Moreover, animals do so much for people."
