What is everyone in a rush for anyway? This is content that is supposed to last at least 2-3 months until they get the instance cluster out, and even longer for those who have no interest in grouping. Perhaps in the future they should, and probably will, add more sources for reputation (Limlight Gorge could use some reputation increases as well). But for now slow down, take some time to smell the virtual flowers, and enjoy what you have. Otherwise, people are just going to hit kindred and then more thing to complain about when they feel like they have se to do in game. # i wouldn't want reputation given to be more ep per warband, but it seems like there isn't really any point to killing warbands other than Bugud... unless you have some sort of fetish for housing banners.... sure they give marks, medallions, but if you've been playing long, you don't exactly have a need for them... # I agree with the posts that say " why so fast to reach kindred rep in everything "... that wasn't the point for petitioning to add reputuation, but apparently you need kindred to get some of the hytbold armour... so to make warbands more desireable, add some small reputation bonus for killing them a day. # to this day, i haven't killed a single is still getting refurbished. I've been riding Minerva since Friday, and the hub brake has really proved itself in the rain a couple of times already, especially compared to the rod brakes alone. # It's a serious haul up Belmont hill, and between the drizzle and a bit of sweat, I was pretty damp by the time I reached their house. I had changed from the dress I wore to work into jeans, which may have been a mistake, because jeans are much slower to dry than tights. # The baby was adorable, red faced and milk-fed sleepy. Their 4 year old was sweet and engaging. I admired their kitchen and we discussed the cabinet maker who'd made both our cabinets. After a bit though, I was pretty chilled from my damp clothes and needed to hit the road. And of course they have a newborn to take

I didn't want to overstay my welcome. I also didn't want to ride all dark. # On the way home I ran into my friend Cris riding his speed fixed gear (yes SA makes a 3 speed fixed gear hub). I wasn't a total surprise, since I'd emailed him for Belmont route advice, and he lives a couple of blocks away from my friends. We chatted for a couple of minutes, but it was too raw to stay still for long, and we headed our separate ways. # Riding Minerva the DL-1 for an extended period like this week is interesting. It takes a lot to get moving, but once she gets up to speed, she's really got a lot of momentum. Even up hills to' around' 15% he paid. I'm guessing it's more like' around' 10%. # The campaign issued an urgent appeal, and in a matter of days, it raised more than $5 million, including a $1 million donation from Alan C. Ashton, the grandson of a former president of the Mormon Church. The money allowed the drive to intensify a sharp-elbowed advertising campaign, and support for the measure was catapulted ahead; it ultimately won with 52 percent of the vote. # Donating money to help overturn gay marriage is hardly likely to hurt Mitt Romney in a Republican nominating battle. In a general election... Ehh, maybe. But probably not. More than likely anyone who feels that strongly in support of gay marriage wasn't going the Republican anyway. # But the diarist hit the nail on the the Mormon thing. THAT'S the reason he doesn't want to s tax records before a Republican primary. So far this cycle the Mormon issue has stayed in the background; the last thing he wants to do is bring it to the forefront by telling everyone how much money he's given to the Latter-day Saints. # WADR to the common political and social inclinations of the DKos community, large-scale Romney charitable-deductible charitable donations to the Mormon Church are likely NOT the potential "bombshell" that makes Romney nervous about releasing his tax returns. Nor is the further connection between the Mormon Church and Prop 8 in California the potential "bombshell". It's already well-known that Romney's a Mormon and that Mormons commonly are expected to tithe generously to their church, especially wealthy Mormons, and that fact of itself isn't going to cut

Obamacare if not BOLD? Not that I feel like finding some bad ideas on Newt's website. It's just a philosophical observation. And, if we don't defeat him, Barry gets to try some more of his own boldness. # We saw the Good Newt tonight after the results were in. Charming, magnanimous towards his Republican counterparts, antagonistic towards, Obama, and generally the guy we'll need to see from now on if he hopes to turn those negatives around. If the Bad Newt shows up, the one with the snarky one-liners against Romney and the others (although he doesn't need to bother with the others at all), he'll simply start to erode the good will he's generated the last few days. If I were him, I'd cool it even if Mitt hit me with both barrels below the belt IF HIS CHARGES HAD SOME TRUTH TO THEM. If they were untrue, I'd just correct the record without calling etc. But that's me. I think that a classy response beats a nasty time. # The Good Newt told us again tonight how he was going to get Obama to a series of ultra-long debates. I have my doubts that there will be ANY debates under the circumstances he described, and even under the rules Obama will insist on I suspect that there may be only one, no more than three. So our hope of nominating the Debate King isn't all that important, IMHO. # Finally, re: Newt v. Mitt -- if Newt does get elected, how will it go? Can he get along with Congressional leadership, or will he try to be President
