In this regard, Eduardo Viveiro de Castro criticizes this concept:"I understand, however, that Jaulin's distinction between 'means' and 'ends' is specious, since it leaves open the possibility of something like 'culpable ethnocide' before 'intentional'; in other words, it suggests that ethnocidal actions may be committed as an 'unintended result' or 'collateral damage' of government decisions, projects, and initiatives whose primary purpose is not the socio-cultural extinction and ethnic disfiguration of a community, but rather the achievement of 'Development projects' (major infrastructure works such as dams, roads, industrial plants, mining and oil extraction plants) that would ostensibly aim to benefit a whole national population. However, since the planning and decision-making bodies of the states that sanction and implement such projects have an inescapable duty to be fully informed about the local impacts of their interventions on the environment in which the affected populations live, ethnocide is often a concrete and effective consequence, in spite of the proclaimed intentions of the ethnocidal agent, and thus becomes tacitly admitted, if not indirectly and maliciously stimulated (what constitutes the intention) by supposed actions of 'mitigation' and 'compensation' that, as a rule, have become yet another effective instrument within the process of cultural destruction, in complete contradiction to their stated purpose of protecting 'impacted' ways of life
